INTRODUCTION

Plaintiffs’ Complaint raises constitutional issues that this Court need not—and should not—reach. Plaintiffs’ desired boycott falls outside the scope of the Act, and Plaintiffs thus lack standing to challenge it. See Doc. 28 (“MTD”) at 8-14. Plaintiffs’ contrary arguments should be rejected as violating the Act’s text. And if the applicability of the Act is at all uncertain, this Court should certify that question or abstain, thereby permitting state courts to resolve those important, threshold issues of state law.

As to the merits, a long line of Supreme Court precedents, including in particular FAIR and Longshoreman, controls here. As in FAIR, the Act merely “affects what [Plaintiffs] must do ... not what they may or may not say.” Rumsfeld v. FAIR, 547 U.S. 47, 60 (2006). And as in Longshoremen, this case is about a “political boycott” resulting from a political dispute with a foreign government’s policy. Int’l Longshoremen’s Ass’n, AFL-CIO v. Allied Int’l, Inc., 456 U.S. 212, 214, 223-26 (1982). In response to these seminal decisions, Plaintiffs offer little more than facile distinctions, arguing that there was no “political boycott” in FAIR and that this case is unlike Longshoremen because here there is no boycott by a union here. But FAIR involved a boycott challenging the military’s exclusion of openly gay service-members—plainly a “political boycott”—and Plaintiffs offer no rationale for why union boycotts should enjoy less protection than a boycott by Plaintiffs’ company with nearly the same core international relations contours as in Longshoremen. Indeed, if anything the picketing in Longshoreman is far more expressive than the commercial purchasing decisions here.

And even if the State could not prohibit boycotts against Israel directly, the First Amendment does not compel the State to subsidize such boycotts with public funds. Plaintiffs concede (at 24-25) that the State can deny subsidies to lobbying and striking/picketing—both highly expressive activities—but deny the same authority for commercial boycotts. There is no principled basis for such a distinction. And because the Act does not compel Plaintiffs’ to say anything or adopt any governmental position as its own, the Act does not impose any unconstitutional condition.

1 implicating Israel, which illustrates how Plaintiffs’ boycott falls outside the Act. Id. at 9.

2 The statutory language is clear that Plaintiffs’ boycott does not fall within the 3 Act’s scope. But if there is any doubt, this Court should either certify that question or 4 abstain under Pullman—particularly given the importance of the issues and the lack of 5 any state court decision addressing the Act. See, e.g., Lehman Bros. v. Schein, 416 U.S.
6 386, 391 (1974) (certification is “particularly appropriate in view of the novelty of the 7 question and the great unsettlement of [state] law.”).

8 II. PLAINTIFFS’ CONDUCT IS NOT “INHERENTLY EXPRESSIVE”

9 Both Supreme Court and Ninth Circuit precedent make plain that “First 10 Amendment protection does not apply to conduct that is not ‘inherently expressive.’” 11 MTD at 19 (quoting Pickup v. Brown, 740 F.3d 1208, 1225 (9th Cir. 2014)). Plaintiffs 12 never dispute this. Thus, if Plaintiffs’ conduct is not “inherently expressive,” virtually all 13 of Plaintiffs’ arguments fail on this threshold ground. And that is just the case.

14 Rumsfeld v. FAIR is perfectly clear that if (as here) someone has to explain with 15 speech the expressive message of the conduct at issue, that conduct is not inherently 16 expressive. In FAIR, the plaintiffs’ First Amendment expressive conduct claim failed 17 because the “actions [at issue] were expressive only because [plaintiffs] accompanied 18 their conduct with speech explaining it.” 547 U.S. at 66. That is even more true here 19 than in FAIR. Plaintiffs offer no explanation for how anyone would be likely to perceive 20 the expressive message of Plaintiffs’ purchase of an HP printer versus one from Canon or 21 Lexmark as relating to Israeli governmental policies. Indeed, Plaintiffs effectively admit 22 as much, explaining that: “These decisions are expressive because Mr. Jordahl 23 explicitly characterizes them as part of his participation in a BDS boycott.” Opp. at 16 24 (emphasis added). Plaintiffs’ admission is fatal under FAIR—because Plaintiffs’ conduct 25 is purportedly expressive only because of Plaintiffs’ own characterization and 26 explanatory speech, FAIR mandates dismissal. 547 U.S. at 66; MTD at 20-21.

27 Plaintiffs attempt to distinguish FAIR by contending that Plaintiffs’ boycott is a 28 “political boycott,” while FAIR’s was not. Opp. at 7 (“Rumsfeld is inapplicable here

1 because political boycotts, including BDS boycotts, are inherently expressive.”). That is 2 specious. The boycott in FAIR was patently political: the law schools disagreed 3 politically with the military’s “Don’t Ask, Don’t Tell” policy. That disagreement about 4 governmental policy—which led to boycotting all military on-campus recruiting—was a 5 “political boycott” under any reasonable understanding of that term. Nor does the 6 decision in Koontz provide any basis for disguising FAIR.² And aside from contending 7 that FAIR did not involve a “political boycott,” Plaintiffs do not offer any other argument 8 why FAIR does not apply here. It does, and is dispositive of Plaintiffs’ claims.

9 It is equally clear that Longshoremen involved a “political boycott”—and, as here, 10 a secondary boycott. There the boycott’s sole basis was the union’s political dispute with

12 ² Plaintiffs rely on Koontz v. Watson, No. 17-4099-DDC-KGS, 2018 WL 617894 (D.
13 Kan. Jan. 30, 2018), in support of this distinction. But Koontz cannot save Plaintiffs’ 14 claim. As an initial matter, Kansas’s brief in that case did not address the merits of the 15 First Amendment claim there, or indeed ever use the words “First Amendment”—as 16 Plaintiffs’ counsel gleefully has noted. See Brian Hauss, Kansas Doesn’t Even Try to 17 Defend Its Israel Anti-Boycott Law available at https://www.aclu.org/blog/kansas-doesnt- 18 even-try-defend-its-israel-anti-boycott-law (last visited March 15, 2018). As Plaintiffs’ 19 counsel aptly observed, “The state quite literally has no defense for the law’s First 20 Amendment [alleged] violations.” Id. Because the merits of the First Amendment claim 21 were not briefed, Koontz is thus best understood as being akin to a default judgment, 22 rather than any meaningful adjudication of the First Amendment merits.

23 In any event—and perhaps unsurprisingly given the completely one-sided nature of the 24 briefing—Koontz profoundly misapprehended the governing law. Koontz simply 25 asserted—without any explanation—that the political boycotts in FAIR and Koontz were 26 somehow different: “Because the Kansas Law regulates inherently expressive conduct 27 and forces plaintiff to accommodate Kansas’s message, it is unlike the law at issue in 28 Rumsfeld.” 2018 WL 617894, at *11. But the Koontz court did not identify any facets of Koontz’s boycott that were any different from FAIR. Notably, both involved boycotts and both were motivated by disagreements with governmental policy set forth by statute.
Koontz does not provide a single intelligible or principled basis for distinguishing between the inherent expressiveness of political boycotts in FAIR and Koontz. Nor could it. Moreover, Koontz also does not attempt to address Longshoremen, FTC or Briggs (likely because none of those cases were brought to the court’s attention).

 In addition, the Kansas statute applied to all state contracts “with an individual or company,” Kan. Stat. Ann. § 75–3740f(a), thus reaching consumer boycotts like Koontz’s.
In contrast, Arizona’s act only applies to “companies,” and thus commercial boycotts.

 It is also worth noting that even Koontz explained that “Conduct is inherently expressive when someone understands that the conduct is expressing an idea without any spoken or written explanation.” Id. Given Plaintiffs’ admission (at 16) that their boycott is expressive precisely (and only) because of how Jordahl has “characterized” it with speech, Plaintiffs’ boycott necessarily enjoys no protection even under Koontz.

1 the U.S.S.R.’s policy in Afghanistan. But the Longshoremen union’s political boycott 2 did not enjoy any First Amendment protection at all. 456 U.S. at 226-27. That was the 3 case even though the Longshoremen’s boycott involved actual picketing—i.e., conduct 4 that is far more expressive than printer purchases and other business supply decisions.

5 Plaintiffs (at 6) half-heartedly try to distinguish Longshoremen on the sole basis 6 that “Plaintiffs are not engaged in a secondary labor boycott.” But Plaintiffs do not 7 acknowledge the untethered, unsupported premise underlying that skeletal assertion—8 that unions somehow enjoy lesser First Amendment rights than Jordahl’s business entity.

9 Faced with the fact that the content of their boycott is not inherently expressive, 10 Plaintiffs retreat to NAACP v. Claiborne Hardware Co., 458 U.S. 886 (1982). Under 11 Claiborne, Plaintiffs argue that all conduct that is part of a “political boycott” is always 12 inherently expressive as a matter of law, even where it is obvious (as here) that the 13 conduct is not inherently—or even modestly—expressive as a matter of fact. Claiborne 14 cannot bear the weight Plaintiffs put upon it for four reasons.

15 First, Plaintiffs’ position that any conduct connected to “political boycotts” is 16 inherently expressive is contrary to FAIR and would lead to absurd results. For example, 17 Plaintiffs apparently contend that Plaintiffs’ purchase of an HP desktop computer that 18 would be exclusively used in Jordahl’s personal office is “inherently expressive” even 19 though no client has ever set foot in that office, Dep. 80:12-15, 47:2-48:11—and thus no 20 one could even conceivably perceive whatever message the computer purports to convey.
21 That is specious. Under that view, Plaintiffs’ continued use of an HP printer would 22 similarly be “inherently expressive” even if the HP decal had fallen off or become 23 illegible. But such a decal-less printer is not expressive at all, let alone inherently 24 expressive. Similarly, by contending that all acts constituting a “political boycott” are 25 inherently expressive as a matter of law, Plaintiffs’ position would presumably extend 26 constitutional protection to acts like speeding on the way to a boycott meeting. While 27 such an act lacks any expressive value, Plaintiffs’ position offers no basis for avoiding 28 this absurd outcome.

1 FAIR rejected such bootstrapping and judged whether each relevant act was 2 inherently expressive. 547 U.S. at 64-66. Plaintiffs cannot simply cry “political boycott” 3 and thereby hand-wave off any analysis of how expressive the acts in question truly are.

4 Second, Claiborne addressed a consumer boycott by individuals, rather than a 5 commercial boycott by businesses. See MTD at 28. Plaintiffs contend (at 4) that the 6 commercial nature of the regulated boycotts is irrelevant. But Plaintiffs themselves 7 attempt to distinguish Briggs & Stratton Corp. v. Baldrige, 728 F.2d 915 (7th Cir. 1984), 8 on the commercial nature of the conduct at issue there. Opp. at 6-7. Moreover, the 9 Supreme Court’s decision in FTC v. Superior Court Trial Lawyers Ass’n specifically 10 declined to extend protection to a political boycott because of the commercial nature and 11 interest of the boycott and its participants. 493 U.S. 411, 426 (1990).

12 Third, the Claiborne boycott “sought only the equal respect and equal treatment to 13 which [the African-American boycotters] were constitutionally entitled.” FTC, 493 U.S.
14 at 426. Contrary to Plaintiffs’ suggestion (at 5), this distinction was not invented by the 15 State but is rather a direct quotation from the Court’s decision in FTC—which 16 substantially relied on the fact that the Claiborne boycott sought only to vindicate 17 constitutional rights in holding that the political boycott in FTC was not protected under 18 the First Amendment. 493 U.S. at 426-27.

19 Fourth, Longshoremen is far closer to the present circumstances than Claiborne: 20 involving a commercial boycott aimed against a foreign nation due to disagreements with 21 its policies, rather than a domestic consumer boycott aimed at securing constitutional 22 rights to which the boycotters were already entitled.

23 III. PLAINTIFFS’ FIRST AMENDMENT CHALLENGES FAIL

24 Even if Plaintiffs’ conduct were inherently expressive, Plaintiffs’ First 25 Amendment claim would still fail.

26 A. The State’s Powerful Interests Overwhelm Any First Amendment 27 Interest Asserted Here

28 Plaintiffs make the categorical and absolutist claim (at 10) that “Political boycotts

1 cannot be regulated.” That is demonstrably false. The outcomes of FAIR, FTC, and 2 Longshoremen—all of which involved political boycotts—alone demonstrate that there is 3 nothing talismanic about the characterization “political boycott.” Political boycotts have 4 actually fared poorly in federal courts. Indeed, aside from Koontz—effectively a default
5 judgment on the First Amendment issues, supra at 4 n.2—Plaintiffs have cited no case 6 that has ever applied Claiborne to strike state regulation of a political boycott.

7 Even if Plaintiffs’ boycotting conduct were inherently expressive, the State has 8 explained how its powerful interests in regulating commerce and eliminating invidious, 9 status-based discrimination in the buying and selling of goods are more than sufficient to 10 justify any burden on Plaintiffs’ First Amendment rights. MTD at 22-25.

11 Plaintiffs offer a smattering of skeletal reasons why the State’s interests are 12 insufficient here, but none of them withstands scrutiny. First, Plaintiffs argue (at 22) that 13 subsection (A) of the statute shows that the statute is not a valid anti-discrimination 14 statute because subsection (B) already addresses discrimination. But subsection (B) only 15 addresses specific discriminatory intent, while subsection (A) address conduct that is 16 likely to be discriminatory in effect. Statutes banning discriminatory effect have been 17 widely upheld against constitutional challenge.³ Second, Plaintiffs argue anti-18 discrimination statutes must yield to the First Amendment, citing Hurley v. Irish-Am.
19 Gay, Lesbian & Bisexual Grp. of Boston, 515 U.S. 557, 568 (1995).⁴ But Hurley 20 involved forced inclusion into an inherently expressive gathering (a parade), and did not 21 involve regulation of commercial conduct at all.⁵

22 Plaintiffs conclude (at 23) with a parade of horrors under which the State

23 ³ For example, the Americans with Disabilities Act (“ADA”) prohibits both intentional 24 discrimination and discriminatory effect. See Crowder v. Kitagawa, 81 F.3d 1480, 1483-25 84 (9th Cir. 1996). But that hardly renders the ADA an unconstitutional anti-discrimination statute. See, e.g., Tennessee v. Lane, 541 U.S. 509, 533–34 (2004).

26 ⁴ Plaintiffs also argue the Act’s anti-discrimination provisions are impermissibly content-or viewpoint-based, which fails for the reasons discussed next. See infra at 8-9.

27 ⁵ Plaintiffs contend (at 20-21) that the Act is not narrowly tailored. That argument 28 appeared in neither their initial motion nor their Complaint, and is thus waived. It further fails because strict scrutiny does not apply. To the extent that strict scrutiny or O’Brien would apply, the applicable requirements are satisfied. See MTD at 25.

1 supposedly “could have invoked its antidiscrimination interests to suppress the campaign 2 to boycott apartheid South Africa.” But Plaintiffs ignore that their arguments would 3 necessarily mean the State would have been powerless to require that government 4 contractors boycott apartheid South Africa (as numerous states did).⁶ Nor do Plaintiffs 5 answer the State’s argument that Plaintiffs’ position could effectively unravel all 6 sanctions laws on First Amendment grounds. See MTD at 28-29 n.19. Plaintiffs thus 7 never genuinely grapple with the obvious consequences of accepting their arguments.

8 B. The Act Is A Valid Viewpoint-Neutral, Anti-Discrimination Statute

9 Plaintiffs also contend the Act is impermissible content-based or viewpoint-based 10 regulation of speech. That argument fails as an initial matter because Plaintiffs’ conduct 11 is not inherently expressive. But even if that were otherwise, it is well-established that 12 anti-discrimination laws “make[] no distinctions on the basis of the organization’s 13 viewpoint.” Bd. of Directors of Rotary Int’l v. Rotary Club of Duarte, 481 U.S. 537, 549 14 (1987). Indeed, “[F]ederal and state antidiscrimination laws ... [are] permissible content- 15 neutral regulation[s] of conduct.” Wisconsin v. Mitchell, 508 U.S. 476, 487 (1993) 16 (emphasis added). That result follows inexorably from the fact that discrimination is 17 banned regardless of the underlying viewpoint (e.g., actual discriminatory motive or 18 trying to curry favor with bigoted customers). See MTD at 24 & n.13. The Act here, for 19 example, would apply equally to a Jewish individual originally from Israel who is 20 boycotting Israel because he believes the Israeli governmental policy has been too soft 21 and that Israel should never have withdrawn its occupation of Gaza.

22 Plaintiffs do not appear to challenge this general and deep-rooted principle of the 23 constitutionality and viewpoint-neutrality of anti-discrimination laws. But they argue the 24 Act should be the first anti-discrimination statute ever struck down as impermissibly 25 content- or viewpoint-based because the Act “applies to boycotts of only one country.”
26 Opp. at 2. Anti-discrimination laws, however, have never been constitutionally suspect

27
28 ⁶ Moreover, because any such law would obviously target just one country, Plaintiffs would apparently condemn it on that basis as well. Opp. at 2.

1 for banning only certain types of discrimination. The federal government may, for 2 example, permissibly ban discrimination against race but not height. That might 3 conceivably be content-based regulation of discrimination, but that has never presented a 4 First Amendment concern. See, e.g., Mitchell, 508 U.S. at 487.

5 Indeed, Congress has only prohibited some types of age discrimination: i.e., 6 discrimination against the old but not the young. See 29 U.S.C. § 621. In doing so, the 7 Act might be considered viewpoint-based: endorsing the “viewpoint” that discrimination 8 against the old is bad but discrimination against the young is fine. But the ADEA has 9 repeatedly survived constitutional challenge. See, e.g., EEOC v. Wyoming, 460 U.S. 226 10 (1983). The same result should obtain here: the Act’s focus on prohibiting discrimination 11 against Israelis and not other nationalities raises no First Amendment concerns.

12 Even more closely on point, the statute in FAIR could easily be characterized as 13 content- or viewpoint-based. It was quite obviously targeted at a single viewpoint: those 14 opposing the military’s policy of excluding gay service-members. 547 U.S. at 51. But 15 that argument—which Plaintiffs’ counsel specifically made in *FAIR*⁷—obviously did not 16 carry the day, or even secure the vote of a single Justice.

17 C. The Act’s Certification Requirement Does Not Mandate Speech

18 Plaintiffs also now assert that the mere act of signing a certification under the Act 19 constitutes compelled speech. Opp. at 11-17. Not so.

20 The act of signing a certification is merely incidental to the regulation of conduct 21 by the Act. Ohralik v. Ohio State Bar Ass’n, 436 U.S. 447, 456 (1978) (“[T]he State does 22 not lose its power to regulate commercial activity ... whenever speech is a component of 23 that activity.”). FAIR makes that much clear: “Congress, for example, can prohibit 24 employers from discriminating in hiring on the basis of race. The fact that this will 25 require an employer to take down a sign reading ‘White Applicants Only’ hardly” 26 presents a constitutional issue. 547 U.S. at 62. Plaintiffs’ signature on the certification is

27
28 ⁷ See Brief of ACLU et. al, FAIR, 2005 WL 2376813, at *15 (Sept. 21, 2005) (“[T]he Solomon Amendment ... regulates speech ... in a viewpoint discriminatory manner.”).

1 even more attenuated from actual speech than the “White Applicants Only” sign.

2 More generally, the government constantly and permissibly requires similar 3 certifications. Indeed, “Innumerable federal and state regulatory programs require the 4 disclosure of ... commercial information.” Nat’l Elec. Mfrs. Ass’n v. Sorrell, 272 F.3d 5 104, 116 (2d Cir. 2001). Individuals, for example, must file tax return that “compel” 6 them to state their income, but that hardly makes a compelled speech claim. Cf. Todd v.
7 United States, 849 F.2d 365, 370 (9th Cir. 1988). Nor do tax returns compel taxpayers to 8 endorse the underlying tax policy, rates and equities; only to certify the statements in the 9 tax return are truthful. So too with Plaintiffs’ concern (at 16) that signing the certification 10 “require[s] Mr. Jordahl to endorse the State’s message of opposition to BDS.”

11 Similarly, the federal and state governments regularly require recipients of public 12 funds to certify that they do not discriminate on the basis of race, gender, etc. See, e.g., 13 Exec. Order No. 11,246 § 203 (1965). Such certifications neither compel any speech nor 14 impermissibly require government contractors to endorse the government’s position that 15 discrimination should be prohibited. They merely (as here) require a certification of what 16 conduct contractors are engaged in. Accepting Plaintiffs’ arguments here could thus 17 severely hamper governments’ ability to enforce their anti-discrimination laws and to 18 prevent public funds from being spent on companies engaged in invidious discrimination.

19 D. The Act Merely Denies A Subsidy To Plaintiffs’ Conduct And Is 20 Therefore Not An Unconstitutional Condition

21 Even if the State could not directly prohibit boycotts against Israel, the First 22 Amendment does not compel the State to subsidize such boycotts with public funds.
23 Indeed, even if engaging in political boycotts were a fundamental right, “a legislature’s 24 decision not to subsidize the exercise of a fundamental right does not infringe the right.”
25 Regan v. Taxation With Representation of Wash., 461 U.S. 540, 549 (1983).

26 Notably, Plaintiffs’ themselves admit (at 25-26 n.10) that “[f]unding conditions 27 requiring an entity to comply with antidiscrimination laws primarily regulate unprotected 28 conduct,” and thus do not violate the First Amendment. Plaintiffs appear to contend that

1 the Act is somehow not an “antidiscrimination law,” but it plainly is. And just as 2 requiring government contractors not to discriminate on the basis of race and gender does 3 not interfere with contractors’ ability to express their views about whether such 4 discrimination is bad or good, the Act similarly does not “requir[e] contractors to 5 accommodate a government message or disavow protected expression.” Opp. at 26 n.10.

6 Plaintiffs’ reliance on Agency for Int’l Dev. v. All. for Open Soc’y Int’l, Inc., 133 7 S. Ct. 2321, 2328 (2013), is misplaced. As previously explained, the Act (unlike the 8 Open Society statute) does not require anyone to adopt the State’s policy position as its 9 own official position; it merely restricts commercial conduct. See MTD at 30. Similarly, 10 Plaintiffs reliance on FCC v. League of Women Voters, 468 U.S. 364 (1984), is misplaced
11 because (1) the Act does not prevent Plaintiffs from actually speaking about any topic 12 (unlike FCC, where the government imposed a blanket ban on all editorializing) and (2) 13 because Plaintiffs could simply form another business entity performing Plaintiffs’ non-14 governmental contracts, which could boycott Israel.⁸

15 IV. THE ATTORNEY GENERAL MUST BE DISMISSED

16 Plaintiffs notably do not offer any answer to the State’s arguments that claims 17 asserted against Defendant Brnovich are unripe and lack Article III standing; nor that 18 Plaintiffs have not alleged any basis for liability against him. Compare MTD at 33 with 19 Opp. at 28. Those concessions alone mandate dismissal against the Attorney General.⁹

20 CONCLUSION

21 For the foregoing reasons, the State’s Motion to Dismiss should be granted.

22
23 ⁸ Contrary to Plaintiffs’ contention (at 26 n.11), “affiliate” can simply mean 24 “subsidiary,” Webster’s Third New International Dictionary (3d ed. 1993), thus 25 permitting Jordahl to establish a new PC for his non-governmental contracts, which 26 would not be an “affiliate”/subsidiary of Mikkel (Mik) Jordahl, P.C. But even if that 27 were otherwise, this Court could sever that “affiliate” provision—and that provision 28 alone—to the extent that it could somehow create an unconstitutional condition.

⁹ The Attorney General is also immune because even the hypothetical actions he could take would not be directed against Plaintiffs. Complaint ¶ 8. And because Ex parte Young only strips state officials of immunity when the officer “acts unconstitutionally,” and the Attorney General has not taken any relevant action, the Ex parte Young exception does not apply. Pennhurst State Sch. & Hosp. v. Halderman, 465 U.S. 89, 104 (1984).
